BIO

Matthew Jackson moved to Columbus from Pennsylvania in 2004, to attend The Ohio State University. In 2008 he graduated with a Bachelors of Science in Business Administration from the Fisher College of Business. Shortly thereafter, he moved to the near-east side of Columbus, with the intent of engaging in and supporting community development. Part of Matthew’s efforts have included volunteering and consulting with Urban Connections, a faith-based community development organization, assisting in its efforts to connect with families and enrich the community on the near-east side; and working with area churches that were trying to engage in community development. Matthew has a history of and passion for partnering with under-resourced communities, advocating for social and community change, and building solid relationships and partnerships with community members in a way that fosters neighborhood togetherness and pride. Since moving to Columbus, Matthew has worked in both the finance and real estate industries, as an employee of Huntington Bank, and a realtor for Trebor Realty, respectively. Matthew is currently the finance and Contracts manager for Defense Integration Solutions a Service Disabled Veteran Owned Small Business, that provides IT services to the Navy. Matthew and his wife Brooke, an attorney who advocates on behalf of indigent youth, are looking forward to serving the residents of the community. They have one son, Miles.
